A well written friends-to-lovers traditional regency

By Christopher

The hero has been the heroine's imaginary Paris to her Helen ever since they met and became best friends a number of years ago. She knows her feelings are not returned because he tells her just about everything, and she has learned to live with that. Instead, she throws herself into reading ancient books and enjoys the level of friendship they have. But when the fathers of the hero and heroine plan to marry them off, their relationship is suddenly thrown off-balance. Drama ensues when the heroine unknowingly accepts the hero's halfhearted proposal, the hero tries to break things off with the girl he is infatuated with, the heroine thinks it's best to end their engagement, and things change irrevocably between them.

For a novel containing an unrequited friends-to-lovers plot, Friday Dreaming is quite well done. To be sure, there is a fair amount of angst throughout as misunderstandings and hurt feelings abound. But there is good deal of enjoyable humor, and - more importantly - an undeniable feel of authenticity to the troubled romance.

Maybe it's the fact that the hero is a generally honorable young man, all things considered, and has the highest respect for both the heroine and their friendship. Or the fact that the heroine's anguish is understandable, and yet she still makes a good show of being a sensible young woman. Whatever it is, Friday Dreaming comes off as a relatively sweet and genuine discovery of love.

Could've been better

By Sandy Milan

I think that this story had the potential to be so much better than it was. It's never easy reading an unrequited love story particularly when the h has so little going for her (the way she was portrayed). She's had a thing for the H for years but although they are great friends, he really doesn't see her. He's gorgeous and she's not. She comes across as an eccentric, myopic blue stocking that no one respects terribly much. The H proposes to her on her birthday and treats her pretty badly that day - not wishing her for her birthday and not staying for dinner. He's basically forced into proposing to her by his father else his allowance will be cut. He wants to marry a woman that his father thinks is unacceptable but he loves this woman. The h breaks the engagement and their relationship is affected. She chooses not to remain friends with the H and it affects him. Slowly he comes around to acknowledging how he really feels. Unfortunately for me I couldn't get past how badly everyone treats the lovely h.
