Overtly biased account of British media

By William Podmore

This detailed study looks at the British press's portrayal of the EU in the year before the 1997 General Election and during the British EU presidency of 1998. From the start, the authors admit to what they call an 'overt as well as ideological pro-European underpinning'. (This incidentally reveals that they make the familiar EU supporters' confusion between Europe and the European Union.)

Their description of the articles that they analyse is often highly tendentious. They construe praise for any European country's achievements as 'pro-Europe', again meaning pro-EU. They describe as 'vague yet highly emotional' and 'Europhobic' the legally correct statement that "No government has the right to give away sovereignty. Our sovereignty does not belong to politicians. It belongs to the people." They write that calling Greece poverty-stricken is 'inadmissibly xenophobic'. So we can easily see how they are able to dismiss all the coverage of the EU by the Times, the Telegraph, the Mail, the Express and the Sun as xenophobic.

They also accuse these papers of 'Germanophobia'. Their evidence for this? That these papers dare to assert that Germany retains its historic ambitions to expand. The authors have apparently discovered a novelty: a capitalist class that has no desire to expand.

So this book shows how empty EU supporters' accusations of xenophobia are. We should not accept our enemy's definitions. Opposition to the EU is extremely widespread - we have to work with all those who oppose it. In the Second World War, the Soviet Union did not hold Churchill's past against him. Similarly, we must welcome patriotic allies in our fight for national independence, and we should concentrate our fire on those who back the EU against our nation. The struggle to retain our sovereignty is a national one.
