nice case studies of peasant women

By W Boudville

Crowell takes us into the rural hinterlands of Gujarat, and looks at development projects initiated by SEWA. We see accounts of the lives of several women. They often started in very impoverished circumstances. Yet typically, by participating in SEWA programs, they were often able to gain significantly more income. And also to educate other villagers. Thus there was an educational nucleation effect, that multiplied the benefits of SEWA.

A chapter on rural microfinance gives a glimpse into an important escape from poverty. By letting people of very modest means avoid borrowing from a local moneylender. The chapter describes alternative micro-credit schemes and those made by SEWA. Not perfect, because the time taken to approve a loan can be several months. Making it unrealistic for short term unplanned expenses, like food shortages.

The book's most uplifting feature are the case study biographies of women helped by SEWA. Not your standard economics text. Yet the SEWA programs are really not in contradiction to those books. They stress building up the individuals so that they can better take charge of their own lives.
